THE WORTH OF SOLDIERS' ENTRUSIASM-Enthusiasm in their profession is indispensable to the success of soldiers. Without it they would be unfitted for their duty in time of peculiar peril. Through it, all fear for themselves is crowded out of mind by active interest in the pending struggle. During a battle north of the James, a private of a Maine regiment, who had stopped at a brook for water, called out to a passing comrade to know how the fight went on. "Well, Corporal - of our company is killed." "Is he?" was the reply, "Well, just let me fill this canteen, and then I'll have a hack at 'em."-And with but another minute's delay, he hurried forward to take part in the fray. Those who are wounded are no less anxious about the course of the battle than those who are unharmed. In that same Maine regiment, a private was stricken down. His brother offered to help him to the rear, but he refused the tender, lest he should take a soldier from his place in line. Later, that brother also fell. True as the other, he too insisted on being left on the field until the stretcher corps should come to him, and there he lay for a weary while, and was twice wounded before his removal. Yet another comrade of these brave men fell with a mortal wound. The colonel seeing him, ordered a stretcher. But that noble fellow, looked up with a pleasant smile and said, "It's no use, colonel, I shall not live but a few minutes. It will only tire the boys to earry me back, and they've got other work to do. I can just as well die here." And there he died. Was not he a hero .- Correspondence Springfield Republican.
